A source can influence people by showing them how was the situation looks like and put some facts and get their attention and emotions. I liked this movie because it shows me how is McCarthy was abusing and accusing people of communism. Also, it shows me how the journalists and reporters responded to this issue during Red Scare. Also, it shows how there were different opinions about Joseph McCarthy and his way of accusing people of communism. There were a group of reporters who were working on CBS and they tried to bring Joseph McCarthy down.

The most prominent of them was Edward Murrow, he was a reporter on CBS, he had a strong personality, a good speaker, and intelligent responses, he influences me and makes me feel like I should develop myself. I like him more than Joseph McCarthy who I have hated him before and the movie increased my hate of him. Because he would accuse innocent people and they will have summoned to court and they were unjust with them and they could send them to prison.

I felt bad for them because I don't like to be in their situation and get accused of something that I didn't do. The reporter who suicides makes me feel sad. This movie was black and white to help us to create the nature of the style of the 1900s.

Also, there were a lot of smokers and there was a few women and blacks, to make you feel how the society back then how they were dealing with segregation etc. This helps me to feel like I traveled through time and came back and make me feel part of it and this makes it a good experience. This enhanced my point of view about Red Scare and McCarthy. Because it showed how anxiety and fear came from people during Red Scare and when McCarthy was accusing people of being a communist. And it showed how many people responded to threat of McCarthy and communism. The movie helped the historians because it's a primary source. Which includes clips of McCarthy and his speeches.

Also, when he asking people in court and replying to Murrow. It helps historians to get a better perspective and nice information how the people responded to McCarthy and the threat of communism, especially reporters (CBS). The movie wasn't biased because it showed to us each side equally.
